Porlock is a picturesque, old-world village on the Somersetshire coast, which was at one time a port, as its name (literally, "land-locked port") signifies. A mile of fertile land now separates it from the sea. The Ship Inn, with its old thatched roof and flower-clad walls, is one of the most interesting features of the village. The poet Southey once stopped here and wrote a poem eulogistic of the beauty of the spot.
